Call for papers: The Political Science Profession in Europe and beyond

Deadline: rolling

European Political Science (EPS) is one of the three journals of the European Consortium for Political Research. It is an international journal devoted to publishing contributions by and for the political science community. EPS publishes research articles, articles about learning and teaching, datasets, debates, as well as articles on the profession of political science in Europe and beyond. While all five pillars are an integral part of the journal, the journal aims at strengthening its role as the flagship journal of the discipline of political science in Europe and beyond. For that reason, we particularly solicit articles about the state of the discipline, its challenges, developments and problems. We are interested in a wide range of topics including broad questions such as the relations between academia and politicians, policy makers, journalists and ordinary citizens, country or continent differences in how scholars research and teach political science, or the discipline’s development since its creation after the World War II. We are also interested in some narrower and more practical topics that cover the job market, inclusion and diversity in the discipline, or tenure and promotion.

Another exciting field we would like to have submissions on is the ever more complex world of publishing. For example, what are the benefits of publishing a book or an article? What is the importance of the impact factor if researchers determine the venue where to publish their work? What are the advantages of publishing in one’s local language or the discipline’s lingua franca English? What are the benefits of publishing open access? Moreover, considerations of data transparency become the more relevant. Can we treat qualitative and quantitative data identical when we discuss questions of data access? Do you think some common standards of data transparency are possible? If so, how could a data transparency policy look like? Finally, ethical considerations are of utmost prominence when we conduct primary research such as survey research, interview research or participant observation research. As such, we would welcome submissions relating to what are standards of good ethical research? Are these the same in different types of traditions, subfields, and countries? How can we protect research subjects and enhance data transparency?

EPS is soliciting single papers, symposia or special issues on any topic relating to the profession of political science in Europe and the world. Interested authors should submit their manuscript via the journal’s homepage: http://www.springer.com/political+science/journal/41304. All submitted papers undergo double blind peer review.

Questions pertaining to this call for papers should be directed to EPS co-editor Daniel Stockemer (dstockem@uottawa.ca)